

Economic Foundations of Legal Studies, by Professor Tyler Cowen, x2312, x4910, tcowen@gmu.edu.

I have an Arlington office on the fourth floor, on the path to Nelson Lund's office. That means turning left from the elevator and heading toward the Harper Library and then turning again left through the doors right before the Harper Library entrance. Note that currently I am in the office next to the office labeled as mine; they are due to change the sign but in the meantime don't be misled. I also have a Fairfax office at Carow Hall.

The main text for the class is Modern Principles: Microeconomics, by Tyler Cowen and Alex Tabarrok. We will proceed through this book at a roughly proportional pace, with some variation depending on the difficulty of the material. The rest of the readings will be distributed each week by blog and Twitter feed.

Jayme Lemke is the very able teaching assistant for this class; her contact email is jlemke@gmu.edu.

The final exam for the class will be given on the specified exam date.

Above all, the goal of this class is to consider the strengths and limitations of the economic way of thinking.